National and international NGOs' workload and activities in response to HIV/AIDS and HIV/AIDS-related conditions: a study in five Latin American countries. Social networks, social change theories, media, and societal-level factors have been associated with how a community responds to HIV/AIDS. The objective of this study is to know how national and international non-governmental organizations (NGOs) working in five countries of Latin America are carried out their activities, in the field of HIV/AIDS and HIV-related conditions. A quantitative, cross-sectional survey was carried out with non-probabilistic (n = 3086) and non-random (n = 135) samples in Colombia, Ecuador, Guatemala, Mexico and Peru. A descriptive and inferential analysis (Chi-square and logistic regression) was performed. The results of the descriptive analysis showed that 64.3% of the non-probabilistic and 83.3% of the non-random samples responded to the survey. The inferential analysis showed that the most frequently reported tasks were prevention and treatment of HIV/AIDS (86.8%) and treatment of AIDS (80.5%) and the most reported activities were general health promotion (88.1%) and social work (87.9%). The difference was significant (p = 0.000). Differences were found depending on the national d0c515b9f4

Methaemoglobinemia is an abnormal increase in the concentration of hemoglobin methaemoglobin (Hb-M) which occurs under conditions of oxygenation. The enzyme responsible for the production of Hb-M is methyltetrahydrofolate reductase (MTHFR). Hb-M is best recognized by a read-out with a spectrophotometer. The proportion of methaemoglobin formed varies with the amount of available oxygen, temperature, duration of exposure, dietary folate and pyridoxine intake, alcohol consumption and glucose-6-phosphate dehydrogenase (G6PD) status. Some disorders, particularly erythropoietin-dependent thalassaemias, are associated with an increased risk of developing methaemoglobinemia. However, the diagnosis should be made on clinical grounds due to the lack of any objective tests to detect methaemoglobin. Treatment is mostly supportive and is based on removal of the offending conditions. 640 So.2d 459 (1994) Charles D. BETHEL v. ESSEX CORPORATION. No. 94-C-3.
